Greetings from Carolyn O'Neil, Administrator, and HUD's Southwest Office of Native American Programs,

HUD's Southwest Office of Native American Programs is pleased to share the attached Program Guidances:

2014-03 Insurance Requirements Reporting

2014-04 SF 425

Additionally, on Wednesday, April 2nd from 2:00 – 4:00 PM EDT, USDA Rural Development (RD) will host its next quarterly Tribal consultation webinar and teleconference featuring the Rural Development and Energy provisions of the 2014 Farm Bill. The purpose of the event will be to provide a brief description of these provisions and share initial analysis on which of these provisions will require additional Tribal consultation and which will not. RD will not be consulting on the implementation of any of these provisions yet, rather we are interested in receiving feedback and suggestions as to whether our initial analysis is appropriate. There will be ample time reserved for participants to ask questions and provide recommendations.

The event will feature welcoming remarks from USDA's Director of the Office Tribal Relations, Leslie Wheelock, and Janie Hipp, USDA's former Director of Tribal Relations and current Director of the Indigenous Food and Agriculture Initiative at the University of Arkansas School of Law, to further underscore the importance of this legislation and USDA Rural Development's work with Tribes. Senior level USDA Rural Development leadership will be on the call to provide brief welcoming remarks and to act as consulting officials.

Instructions for accessing the toll-free teleconference and webinar are included below. If you have questions or concerns, contact USDA Rural Development's Native American Coordinator, Tedd Buelow, at 720-544-2911 or tedd.buelow@wdc.usda.gov.

Join the Teleconference by using the information below:

The Rosebux Sioux Tribe set up a prayer camp on rural land near Mission, S.D. in late March 2014 to protest the Keystone XL pipeline — which cuts through an area that contains historical and cultural tribal artifacts. The event was also attended by farmers and ranchers who are part of the Cowboy & Indian Alliance fighting the pipeline, and was a prelude to the Reject + Protect event coming up in Washington, D.C. Informal rodeos held by farmers were once standard entertainment in Iowa. Now they are a rarity, but the Sandburr ranch hopes it can grow the tradition.

Federal Water Tap, March 31: EPA Water Proposal Ruffles Feathers

It was an unusual move for the Obama administration.

Instead of waiting for a Friday afternoon to unveil a controversial new rule, the Environmental Protection Agency announced its Clean Water Act proposal on Tuesday – just days before Gina McCarthy, administrator of the EPA, was scheduled to testify in Congress about the agency's 2015 budget request.

The rule in question seeks to clarify a definitional quagmire that pestered the agency for nearly a decade: Which bodies of water does the EPA have the authority to regulate?

The rule would formalize regulatory guidelines already in place and, in time, provide a clear distinction between regulated and unregulated waters.

“Navigable waters” is the standard litmus for Clean Water Act regulation. The proposed rule would also cover streams, creeks, and wetlands that affect the quality of navigable waters. This is called having a “significant nexus” – a term that would be defined case by case under the proposal.

McCarthy told a House Appropriations subcommittee that the agency wants to establish greater clarity about its jurisdiction and it wants to hear from the public how best to determine a “significant nexus.”

“We are identifying the rivers, streams, and tributaries and other water bodies that science tells us are necessary to really protection the chemical, physical, and biological integrity of our navigable waters,” McCarthy said.

Her arguments landed on mostly hostile ears in the Republican-led committee.

Hal Rogers, the Appropriations Committee chair, had contempt for the proposed rule, claiming hyperbolically that it was “the biggest land grab in the history of the world.”

The Republican who represents eastern Kentucky’s coal country also pinned America’s recent economic performance, underwhelming in his view, on the EPA boogeyman.

“You’re grinding to a halt the economic engine of this country,” Rogers said. “No wonder we’re having trouble getting the economy going again. It’s been terribly sluggish for years. And I think a major part of it is the regulations and the fear of this agency that is depressing the business climate of this country.”

Rogers claimed the proposed water rule would halt new shopping centers, road construction, and coal mining.

“That ain’t gonna happen, Madam Administrator,” Rogers said, vowing to oppose the rule. “And right here [in this committee] is where a good part of the fight is going to take place.”

EPA Budget Hearing

Though the Clean Water Act consumed the first 90 minutes of the budget hearing, a few words were said about the EPA’s $US 7.9 billion spending plan.

That figure represents a 3.8 percent cut from 2014, and it would be the fifth consecutive reduction in the agency’s budget.

The subcommittee chair Ken Calvert, a California Republican, applauded the cut.

“I see this proposed reduction as good for the first step in this year budget cycle as it brings the agency’s budget in line with more historic funding levels,” Calvert said.

Under the proposed budget, the EPA would have 15,000 employees, a reduction of 2,000 compared to 2011 and a level not seen since late 1980s. Calvert said the staff reduction is a priority for the subcommittee. That thinking is also reflected within the EPA, which, according to its five-year plan, published in November, will reduce the number of inspections by 30 percent and cut the number of enforcement cases by 40 percent.

Calvert did have concerns about funding for the nation’s water infrastructure. The president’s budget cuts two low-interest loan funds for drinking water and sewers by 25 percent.

“It’s important from both security and economic standpoint that we have a protective and efficient water infrastructure system,” Calvert said. “We often discount the value of clean drinking water until it is not there.”

Calvert did not connect the dots between regulatory oversight and clean water. His colleague, Democrat Nita Lowey of New York, did so for him.

“Cuts in staffing suggest a decrease in inspection and an increase in self-regulation by industry,” Lowey said. “The West Virginia chemical spill and North Carolina coal ash spill demonstrate the dangers of this approach.”

Four Corners Power Plant Draft EIS

A new surface mine for one of the largest power plants in the western U.S. will produce 134 million tons of coal over its 25-year lifespan, according to a draft environmental review.

United States Supreme Court Rejects Alaska's Request for Review of the Katie John Decision

Re: State v. Norton, 3:05-cv-00006-HRH consolidated with Katie John v. United States of America, 3:05-cv-00158-HRH

On March 31, 2014, the United States Supreme Court rejected the State of Alaska's petition for certiorari review of the Ninth Circuit's decision upholding the 1999 Final Rules promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture to implement part of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act concerning subsistence fishing and hunting rights on federal waters.

The Court's rejection of the State's appeal marks the end to nearly 27 years of litigation by the Native American Rights Fund on behalf of Ahtna elder, Katie John of Mentasta. The Katie John cases, more than any other subsistence cases, exemplify the contentious battle waged between federal, tribal and state interests over jurisdiction of Alaska Native subsistence fishing rights (go to NARF website for full story of Katie John litigation and a Katie John profile).

In Alaska v. Babbitt, 72 F.3d 698 (9th Cir. 1995) ("Katie John I"), NARF established that in enacting ANILCA, Congress intended to protect subsistence fishing when withdrawing public lands in Alaska, and ANILCA's subsistence priority applies to those navigable waters in which the United States owns so called "reserved water rights," or about 60% of Alaska's inland waters.

In January 1999 the federal government issued its regulations identifying the waters in Alaska which fall under federal management. Before the regulations became effective, the State of Alaska petitioned the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals to hear the case en banc. The Court agreed to have 11 judges hear the State's en banc appeal. After briefing and oral argument, the Court of Appeals reaffirmed its earlier ruling and stated that "the [1995] judgment rendered by the prior panel and adopted by the district court should not be disturbed or altered by the en banc court." 247 F.3d 1032 (9th Cir. 2001) (Katie John II).

In 2005, the State of Alaska filed another lawsuit challenging the federal agency final rule implementing Katie John I. Representing Katie John again, NARF brought a counter law suit and argued that the regulations did not go far enough but should have extended to Alaska Native allotments and upstream and downstream waters. (Katie John III). In July 2013, the Ninth Circuit ruled in favor of the federal government and held that the Secretaries appropriately used notice-and-comment rulemaking, rather than adjudication, to identify those waters that are "public lands" for the purpose of determining the scope of the Act's rural subsistence policy. The panel concluded that, in the 1999 Rules, the Secretaries applied Katie John I and the federal reserved water rights doctrine in a principled manner. The panel held that it was reasonable for the Secretaries to decide that: the "public lands" subject to the Act's rural subsistence priority included the waters within and adjacent to federal reservations; and reserved water rights for Alaska Native Settlement allotments were best determined on a case-by-case basis. Alaska v. Jewell, 720 F.3d 1214 (9th Cir. 2013) (Katie John III).

Unfortunately, Katie John did not live long enough to see the completion of the litigation as she passed away at age 97 in the summer of 2013. Katie's granddaughter, Kathryn Martin, expressed relief that the ruling would stand and stated, "Praise the Lord, my grandma can rest in peace."
